PRACTICE HAZING IN ALMOST EVERY WALK OF LIFE

IT IS NOT CONFINED SOLELY TO COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

SOME NUMEROUS INSTANCES

Boys Who Enter Offices And Shops are Made the Victims of Practical Jokes by Associates—Has a Tendency to Break Them In With Their Work—Embarrassing But Harmless.

A boy can learn a good deal about hazing without going to college, West Point or Annapolis.

Little Tommy Greene "accepts a position" as eighth and latest boy in a big office. His first day he is at work he may be sent by one of the older office boys to get the key to the red ink bottle from the head bookkeeper. This individual has a prenasal grout that develops into near apoplexy at the familiar question. Tommy retreats in bewilderment, and the older boy says:

"You ought to have waited till he was done figuring. You butted in on him."

Later in the day Tommy is asked to find the paper stretcher, quick! for Mr. Jones' stenographer. He searches all the closets in the office under the direction of the other boys, but cannot find the missing machine. He begins to feel himself unsuited to a business career.

After lunch he may be supplied with a small package of bread crumbs and sent up to the roof of the sky-scraper to feed the eagles. The next day, perhaps, if a great light had not dawned on him, he is persuaded to call up Mr. Lyon or Mr. Fish to the telephone number that proves to be that of the zoo or the aquarium.

If Tommy sets out to learn the printing business he will be taken in hand with enthusiasm by nearly everybody but the master printer himself. If the printer is in a building that is the home of a number of similar establishments, Tommy may spend a day or two traveling from floor to floor in the search of some borrowed instrument, such as a shooting stick, which appears to have been lent from compositor to electrotypist until it has been through the hands of every man in the building.

If he begins work in a machine shop one of the first tools that Tommy hears about is a left-handed monkey wrench. When he asks for it a foreman will give him a steel casting weighing about 50 pounds, that must be carried across the yard and through the foundry and over the bridge to the foreman of the pattern shop.

Another tool is the glass hammer, used for driving rubber tacks. One of the electricians in the testing room may need a pall of juice for testing a transformer, and Tommy will have to go to the power house for it. It may fall to his lot, also, to be the messenger who tries to borrow from a neighboring plant the fly wheel of the Corliss engine.

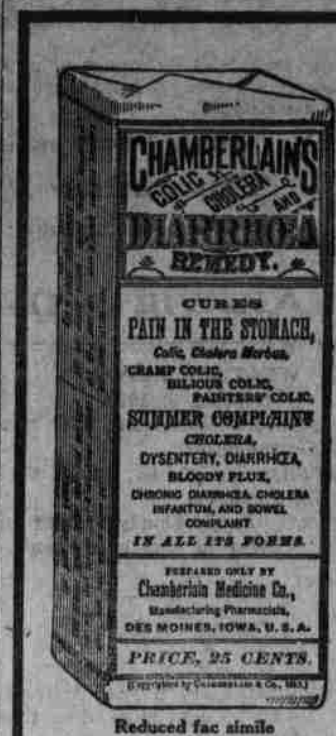

If Tommy Greene is a country boy whose first real job happens to be in a quarry, he will probably come in contact with the stone stretcher before he has been at work many hours. This device may consist of a truck full of wire rope, tackle and sledges, to be delivered to the man in the fifth shed down the road to the crossing.

If our hero still retains his pristine confidence in the goodness of the world, he may, as Private T. Greene, have experience thrust upon him in the national guard, especially if he joins just before his regiment goes into camp.

The key to the flagstaff or to the parade ground has been lost and he must find it. One of his squad mates is deeply concerned to discover that Greene's tent wrench is missing from his brand new equipment; it behooves the new soldier to make a tent canvass of the company street in order to find some tent with more than its correct allowance of wrenches.

He will have difficulty in discovering the ten yards of akimish line that some one has told him that he must get before reveille next morning. A cavalry screen is another object that he may be required to locate. One of the officers, he is told, has ordered him to get from the ordnance sergeant a keg of strap oil.

These tasks require time and energy, but to find the posts for out-post duty is perhaps the hardest job of all. They will evade the recruit in the most exasperating way, though he frequently comes within an ace of finding them.

the wood up straight instead of making the camp look like a dodgasted train wreck.

When the bottom of the pile is almost reached and most of the wood neatly stacked the commissary sergeant comes to life and remembers that the posts under the pile are red posts, anyway, and that of course B company's posts are painted blue.

Then there arises a violent discussion as to the color of posts for out-post duty. A crowd gathers and much ill feeling is displayed. The recruit is the center of the turmoil and is frequently piled with questions as to what his various orders have been and how well he has obeyed them.

To settle the matter, Private Greene is sent to Lieutenant Robinson, the surgeon. This officer listens attentively to the whole story, while the expectant crowd lurks in the middle distance. At the end of the recital the surgeon paints a U. S. in collodion on the back of the recruit's hand and discharges him, cured.

Money Comes in Bunches
to A. A. Chisholm, of Treadwell, N. Y., now. His reason is well worth reading: "For a long time I suffered from indigestion, torpid liver, constipation, nervousness, and general debility," he writes. Now I can attend to business every day. It's a wonderful medicine." Infalible for stomach, liver, kidneys, blood and nerves. 50c at all druggists.
